The Compliance and Ethics Professional magazine has several regular columnists who are very talented. Each has a very different perspective and background. They are practical and experienced. Many have strong opinions. They tell you what you need to know instead of what you want to hear. They are street smart in addition to being book smart. They are all about helping the profession do good rather than look good.

Snell

They can explain it to you in terms you understand as opposed to the wannabees who think the more complicated they make it, the smarter they will sound.

If you want a mind bending, cool Venn compliance diagram with 200 boxes, lines, and arrows, call me and I will give you a website link. If you want compliance articles written by world famous Fortune 500 General Counsels who teach at schools covered in ivy but couldn't identify an effective compliance professional to save their life, call me and I will send you a link to their blog. If you want a 700-page description of a compliance program, I can hook you up. Many people writing about the compliance profession and compliance programs don't know what is important, so everything is important, which means nothing is important.

However, if you want a practical description of a compliance program, just open a copy of the Compliance and Ethics

Professional table of contents and start reading. There is no better compliance publication for the compliance profession in the world. I have been told by some members that they get hooked on some of our columnists. They open the magazine every month to that column and read it first. I wish you were all hooked. I love our columnists.

They tell you what you need to know instead of what you want to hear. They are street smart in addition to being book smart.

Donna has built two multi-national compliance programs and completely gets the intricacies of the compliance officers' role. Art is practical. Leslie works for one of the most impressive business research firms in the country. Meric has great experience in investigations. Jeff is an articulate lawyer who has worked with our profession for years. Joe is simply the most knowledgeable compliance professional in the world. Shin brings the perspective of many other cultures and countries. Sally has a strong international perspective. Robert brings to us great privacy experience from Europe.

What a lineup. What great players. These guys are so good they could beat the Yankees. *
